

Counter-Cosmos

Counter-Cosmos is a book about mysticism, but also a book with a scientific bent: what science denies, so does the author. The West today is unprecedentedly unspiritual, yet the spiritual is part of mankind's natural make-up: denying it leaves us incomplete and in danger of disintegration. The book deals mainly with Western mysticism - begins with Einstein, in fact - and so is comprehensible to Western readers. Part One strips mysticism down to its basic elements: there's nothing necessarily supernatural about it at all. What is it? What causes it? What is it like? What are the benefits? How many levels are there? How many people are mystics? Can you be one without knowing it? Part Two is more personal and explores those minor mystical events which light up daily life. Partly, this is done through anecdotes from the author's experience as the writer of a series of TV science documentaries. Partly it is also done through short, blog-like analyses and comments on the everyday happenings of a single summer. THE AUTHOR Dick Sullivan lives in central London, England. He's a former professional TV script writer: for ten years he worked on science documentaries. This has left him with an abiding insight into the need to accept scientific findings. His lifelong interest in things spiritual and mystical is tempered by those years working with scientists. Counter-Cosmos is a sequel to Undertones: Mysticism in an Age of Umber. (Many of the chapters in this book first appeared on a website belonging to Brown University, Rhode Island, USA.). Among books of poetry, Caperbar can be picked out as being primarily about spiritual matters. Dick Sullivan's earlier works include Navvyman, the definitive history of navvying and navvies. He is a descendant of navvies - the men who built England's canals, railways and dams.
